FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
September 16, 2015

Pine Ridge, South Dakota – “I’m feeling very happy today,” said President John Yellow Bird Steele, President of the Oglala Sioux Tribe of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, “that the Ramah Navajos, Zuni and Oglala Sioux Tribe contract support (Indirect Cost) shortfall struggles appear to be concluded. We are satisfied with the fine settlement that has been reached here. Previously they paternalistically shorted us and didn’t give a darn.. We are hopeful that we are now entering into a period of mutual cooperation with the Department of Interior. We hope the settlement clears the air for the future.”

The contract support shortfall struggles are the subject of the Supreme Court’s Salazar v. Ramah Navajo Chapter court case of which the Oglala Sioux Tribe and Zuni Pueblo are a part. The Supreme Court on June 18, 2012 ruled in favor of the Ramah Navajo Chapter litigants. The Oglala Sioux Tribe joined the litigation in 2000 and has been an active participant in trying to recover contract support costs that rightfully should have been paid to the Tribe.

In the 1970’s, under the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act, the Oglala Sioux Tribe entered into several contracts with the Bureau of Indian Affairs which gave the Tribes the authority to establish Tribal Charters to manage such services as public safety and education, and to exercise tribal self-determination for the management of services previously managed by the BIA. Such contracts were meant to authorize the Tribe’s full fiscal management of these resources to the same extent the Secretary of Interior would have run them. Unfortunately, due to funding shortfalls for the past several decades, the Tribes have been severely hampered in trying to manage the contracts at 100% levels of service.

The Contract Canons of Construction have now been applied to Indian self-determination contracts just as they are to contracts with defense contractors and paper clip manufacturers. That was previously missing.
